Rage, uncontrolled...
Power, unbridled...
An island, unimaginable

The New York Times bestselling author Stephen King returns with a chilling tale about a man who learns to access vast powers of creativity—and destruction. After an accident costs him his arm, Edgar decides to move to Duma Key, hoping to find solace in a pastime he used to enjoy when he was younger—painting. He soon discovers, however, that his talent is a lot more powerful than he remembered. What he paints eerily changes the world around him. What's more, when he paints things out, they disappear. Even people. As he grapples with his newfound abilities, he realizes that they're somehow tied to Elizabeth—his elderly landlady—and when the ghosts of her past begin to appear, the truth about his talent becomes terrifyingly clear....

Edgar must find out where his power is coming from before he paints himself into a corner...

...don't remember exactly when it stopped being me that was painting...and to this day I'm not sure it ever stopped painting me; maybe it, maybe us. All I know is that at some point I lied down and saw my right arm in the last of the falling daylight and the occasional stutters of lightning. The stump was red, the rest dead white. The muscles hung loose and heavy. There was no scar, no seam except the tan-line, but now there it itched like old dry fire. Then the lightning flashed again and there was no arm, there had never been an arm—not on Duma Key, at least—but the itch was still there, so bad it made you want to bite a piece out of something."
